INTRODUCTION TO THE LIBRARIES BUILD BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS TOOLKIT

All libraries, no matter their size or budget, can support aspiring and existing small business owners and entrepreneurs. Public libraries have a long history of fostering equitable economic development, small businesses, and entrepreneurship in their community.

They excel at addressing many of the unseen barriers to economic advancement, even though libraries often do not frame their work in terms of its economic benefit. For example, in addition to providing programs and resources on business-related topics, libraries build digital skills; offer literacy, ESL, and GED classes; provide internet and technology access; support Green Card and citizenship application processes; connect people with affordable health care; offer early education programs; and provide youth of all economic backgrounds the opportunity to engage with STEAM learning. If you're reading this toolkit, you probably already understand how the library can play a role in supporting a thriving and equitable local economy. But does your community know it?

The library is an important stakeholder in business development, but not everyone knows what the library is already doing, or could be doing. This toolkit is here to help. It provides approaches to outreach you can use to connect with new partners, community leaders, funders, and program participants. As a result of using this toolkit, you should be better able to:

- Educate the business community and public about library business services
- Change or expand public perceptions of what the library has to offer businesses
- Improve the efficiency and effectiveness of library business services and programs, regardless of library size or budget

The toolkit can help you tailor how you talk about your goals, resources, and impact to appeal to a variety of stakeholders. You can leverage stories and resources from within your own programs, or borrow some from the Libraries Build Business Playbook or the Libraries Build Business Initiative Highlights Report to get started.

This toolkit is designed to help you confidently get the word out about the great work you are already doing in your community for four key audiences:

- Aspiring and existing small business owners/entrepreneurs (your target audience for your programs/services)
- Community leaders: elected officials, funders, and other stakeholders
- Potential partners: community organizations, non-profit organizations, and business support groups
- Library Administration: the library board, executive staff and leadership, friends groups, and other departments

The content in the toolkit is based on the knowledge gained through ALA's Libraries Build Business initiative. As part of a multi-year, $2 million dollar investment, ALA worked with a cohort of 13 public libraries from a diverse set of communities across the country. They collaborated to answer questions, engage in research, pilot projects, develop resources, and share these learnings

The St. Louis County Library in Missouri created the Small Business Value Calculator in 2018 in order to put a monetary value on the services they provide.

To build the calculator, they listed all the small business services and resources they offer at the library and looked for what they would cost on the open market. Resources may include: marketing, demographic, industry, and consumer research; computers and technology; and classes and workshops. The staff totaled up the dollar value of using everything the library offers just once in a year and determined that the library was saving customers more than $13,000 each year. This piece of data catches the attention of business owners, community partners, and decision makers and helps to illustrate the great work the library is doing on small business development.

with the wider library community. LBB projects have impacted more than 15,000 small business owners and entrepreneurs across the United States, serving a range of entrepreneurs with a focus on BIPOC and marginalized groups, including individuals re-entering the workforce from jail or prison, primarily Spanish-speaking sidewalk vendors, rural entrepreneurs, tribal members, and minority-owned tech startups. Other deliverables from the project include:

- The Libraries Build Business Initiative Highlights Report highlights the key learnings and program elements of Libraries Build Business. It demonstrates how libraries can narrow economic divides and empower diverse entrepreneurs.
- The Libraries Build Business Playbook is a resource collaboratively developed by LBB cohort members to share practical resources and advice, promising strategies and models, and inspiration for programming and services for any library, no matter their size or budget, to adapt in their context. It will guide your library to a local program fit with resources including monitoring and evaluation tools that your library can use to track progress and drive impact; specific strategies to prioritize equity, diversity, and inclusion; and accessible suggestions for getting started, building partnerships, and more.
- Libraries that Build Business: Advancing Small Business and Entrepreneurship in Public Libraries, edited by Megan Janicki (ALA Editions, 2022). This book collects 26 essays on a variety of real-world library programs and services. It provides an in-depth look at what libraries of all sizes and types around the country are doing, as well as tips for how you might adapt some of these ideas to your own community.
- Libraries Build Business Evaluation Resource Guide and Case Study are easy tools to walk you through using the Public Library Association’s evaluation tool, Project Outcome, and the customized Libraries Build Business evaluation materials. Create a simple survey tailored to your library’s small business or economic development program and get feedback to continuously improve.

Libraries Build Business continues today with a peer coaching program and active Slack community for library workers. For the most up to date information on Libraries Build Business, visit the website at ala.org/advocacy/workforce/grant.

With all the great work underway at your library, it’s not always easy to find time to focus on promotion, but outreach is critical to your success, sustainability, and growth. This toolkit is here to help you engage with community stakeholders and let your small business and economic development community know what the library can do.

TOOLKIT NAVIGATION QUIZ

I'm looking at this toolkit because...

Then you might want to start with...

I want to broaden the community's perception of the library.

The sections you might want to look at first are Elected Officials, Funders, and Community Leaders and Business Support Organizations. Then look at Library Staff.

I want to increase usage of my library's small resources or services.

Start with the Small Business Owners and Business Support Organizations sections, then Library Staff.

I want to learn more about what small business owners in my community need.

Start with the Small Business Owners section, then look at Business Support Organizations.

I want to encourage social, political, or funding support.

Jump to Elected Officials, Funders, and Community Leaders and Business Support Organizations.

I want to find community partners for my programs or services.

Start with Business Support Organizations, then consider Small Business Owners.

An event I'm trying to prepare for is...

Then you might want to start with...

A presentation to business owners, like a Chamber of Commerce lunch or meeting.

Small Business Owners

A presentation to other community stakeholders, like a community service group.

Business Support Organizations or Elected Officials, Funders, and Community Leaders (depending on the composition of the group)

A round table or coalition meeting, where I may share information informally.

Business Support Organizations or Elected Officials, Funders, and Community Leaders

An event I'm trying to prepare for is...

→ Then you might want to start with...

A meeting with a potential partner

→ Business Support Organizations

A meeting with a small business owner

→ Small Business Owners

No event—I'm just trying to generally increase awareness of the library's economic value and business resources.

→ Library Staff

My level of comfort talking about the library's business resources is...

→ Then you might want to use this toolkit because...

LOW

I don't have a lot of experience with this or I'm not sure how to put the library's value into words.

This toolkit is for you! By reading the section introductions, you can use it to learn about the different audiences you might encounter and how you might want to work with them. Then the materials in each section can give you an idea of where and how to start.

MEDIUM

I have some experience promoting the library's business resource, but I'm open to learning new, effective ways to get the word out.

This toolkit is for you! The materials in this toolkit include compelling talking points and stories based on learning from a recent, large-scale national initiative. It's a simple way to keep your communications up to date.

HIGH

I'm the face of small business services for my library. But I'm really busy, so could you make me a presentation or handout to save me time?

This toolkit is for you! With easy-to-adapt templates for presentations, handouts, emails, and more, this toolkit can save you time so you can focus on making connections.

All the pieces in this Toolkit are free downloads from the LIBRARIES BUILD BUSINESS website: ala.org/advocacy/workforce/grant

BUSINESS SUPPORT ORGANIZATIONS

“[Biz.ability] is a free resource for local business owners who may not have the knowledge of how to find this type of information. It is also amazing how it brings the small business community together in a way that builds an incredibly strong network.”

BUSINESS SUPPORT ORGANIZATIONS

Business support organizations (sometimes called entrepreneur support organizations, or ESOs) refer to formal groups or institutions that provide education or support to current or aspiring small business owners.

These types of organizations can vary widely in size and focus, ranging from large, established government agencies to for-profit businesses to small local nonprofits. Which types of support organizations exist in a community will also differ. However, nearly all communities have access to some of these.

Examples of Business Support Organizations are:

- Governmental: Small Business Administration (SBA), Office of Indian Economic Development (OIED), city or county economic development departments
- Organizational or Commercial: Chambers of Commerce, Downtown or Main Street Associations, banks or credit unions with small business lending programs, coworking spaces, nonprofits such as SCORE
- Educational: Small Business Development Centers (SBDCs), local universities or community colleges with a business program, instructors in digital or job skills training programs such as Goodwill
- Cultural: Grassroots organizations or nonprofits that provide comprehensive services to a particular demographic, such as immigrants or refugees, women, youth, veterans, BIPOC populations, etc, and that have a small business education or support component.
- Social: Conveners of social gatherings for current or aspiring small business owners, such as Green Drinks, One Million Cups, or local business meet-up or networking groups.

Despite their differences, business support organizations share some common goals and characteristics. They all offer services to small business owners and entrepreneurs. As such, they have subject matter expertise in technical business topics, awareness of some of the goals and needs of the small business community, and relationships with small business owners who may not be current library users. Support organizations are often looking to bring in new users by increasing awareness of their programs or services, especially among populations they are not effectively reaching.

As a result of these attributes and goals, libraries may want to pursue one or more of the following goals in their communications with business support organizations.

- Education. Libraries should make business support organizations aware of their services, programs, and resources for entrepreneurs. These organizations offer a very effective pathway for getting the word out about business-specific resources and services at the library, because both they and their clients are the target users. For their part, business support organizations appreciate learning about free resources they can use with their clients.
- Referrals. Business support organizations are potentially good referral partners. Like libraries, support organizations have limited resources; unlike the library, they tend to have a limited scope. As a result, they are generally happy to send people to the library for resources or support they do not provide in-house, that are outside their area of expertise, or for ongoing support after a class or program ends. In the other direction, the library may benefit from referring patrons to a business support organization. For example, the library might refer a patron who is looking for business advice, or is seeking access to a program like a business incubator. Business support organizations often appreciate, measure, and even rely on referrals, so cross-referrals to and from the library build strong relationships over time.
- Potential partnerships. Business support organizations may make good partners for programs or services. For example, staff from an SBDC may be able to present a program on starting a business that goes beyond library staff's subject matter expertise. Libraries may offer access to individual mentors by partnering with SCORE, business-related legal information by partnering with the Bar Association, or financial or tax assistance from a credit union. While not every business support organization will be the right fit for a full partnership at all times, partnerships can be fruitful when their subject matter expertise and existing audience may allow the library to expand its range of services and programs, and the library's platform helps them reach new audiences.

The key message for libraries to communicate to this audience is that the library can help them expand their client base and serve their clients better.

Libraries support equity, diversity, and inclusion for entrepreneurs

- Libraries are a trusted resource in underserved communities.
- Libraries have deep experience working with partners and building culturally responsive programs and services.
- Library business programs reach underserved populations.

Among survey respondents in a national Libraries Build Business initiative from the American Library Association:

- 77% identified as women
- 64% identified as BIPOC

Slide 1: Thank you for inviting me to speak with you today. I'm [name] from [library]. By the end of this presentation, I hope to have completely revolutionized how you think about your public library. You all know and love us for our wonderful books and lovely space, and I hope you have warm memories of attending story times as a child or with your own children or grandchildren. But my goal is to knock your socks off with how much the library does to support small businesses and the local economy.

CASE STUDY
Freddie Lee's American Gourmet Sauce

YOU ARE HERE: LIBRARIES BUILD BUSINESS

Slide 2: On this slide, you want to tell a story that frames how one entrepreneur used library resources to help business succeed. This story is an example from the Ferguson Municipal Public Library in ALA's Libraries Business Cohort. If you have a local example you can use, replace this slide with their story.

I'd like to tell you about Freddie Lee. Freddie had a great product—a BBQ sauce that he had loved for years. But once he started his company, he found he needed some help to get it into the hands of buyers. He went to the library, where a librarian helped him get on a computer, build his social media, and get started with social media marketing. The librarian connected him with a wealth of people who could help him launch his business, and maybe more importantly, with connections to people who could help him, including a mentor. Freddie Lee's American Gourmet Sauce is now made in the shared kitchen of a business incubator and is available in 150+ grocery stores across the United States.

Libraries are a valuable economic resource

- Librarians break down economic barriers for entrepreneurs
- Entry point to the entrepreneurial ecosystem
- 100% of all US libraries provide free services to entrepreneurs
- Career and training services, grants, space and tech, and other resources
- Librarians increase access for underserved populations, such as women and BIPOC entrepreneurs.

Slide 3: You can already start to see from [Freddie's] story how library resources can help one small business and imagine how it might help others. But now I want you to think bigger, about how through the kinds of services we offered to Freddie, your library is making the whole local economy thrive.

Dear Susan,

Hello! I'm Audrey from Town Public Library. I'm reaching out to you because of the important role the Chamber of Commerce plays in our small business community. We met at last month's Chamber mixer event, and I was so impressed by all you're doing to revitalize Main Street. I'd like to learn more about your work and your goals. The library is increasing its focus on an equitable local economy, and I would love to understand how we can best support you. You may be surprised to find out how much the library has to offer our Main Street small businesses – all for free.

Would you have half an hour in the next couple of weeks for me to take you out for a coffee? (Or I'm happy to meet virtually, if that's more convenient for you.)

I'm looking forward to learning more about how we might support our small businesses together.

TIPS FOR CONNECTING with Local Small Business Support Organizations (SBSOs)

Find out who/what's in your area.

Cursor internet searches can provide you with a lot of information on where to find a SCORE mentor, the meeting location of the area Chamber of Commerce, or the contact information for a Small Business Development Center. However, business support organizations might be smaller or more informal, such as a local Rotary Club Chapter, a community college academic department, or a locally based economic development corporation. If it's not immediately apparent that an organization or association is oriented to small businesses, find a way to contact a representative of the organization to confirm or sit in on a meeting.

What have they done before meeting you?

Before meeting with anyone, try to find out if they have specific goals, offer a specific service, or have conditions as part of associating with them—e.g., a downtown business association might require constituent members to have premises on the “main street” of your community. Find out which small businesses in your community have worked with these small business support organizations and use that to gauge their effectiveness and reach. Be prepared to network and attend open meetings!

What do you bring to the table?

As your end goal is to establish a lasting working relationship with this SBSO, start by conducting an internal review of your library. Leverage this toolkit's Asset Mapping Worksheet for this. What is your workspace like? What tools do you offer to both your general patrons and your aspiring entrepreneurs? What are the existing strengths of your small business support services? Before setting a meeting, be able to explain what your library currently offers current and future small business owners—if possible, consider putting an approximate dollar value on your library offerings, or share a story about a library user in the process of starting their own business. This is the first part of your pitch (See Talking Points for Small Business Organizations.)

ALA American Library Association  TIPS FOR CONNECTING WITH LOCAL SMALL BUSINESS SUPPORT ORGANIZATIONS (SBSOs) / 1

What are you asking for?

The second part of your pitch should be about them. Plan ahead to demonstrate your understanding of what their SBSO provides to small business owners, and how partnering with your library could be beneficial to their goals. If necessary, start simple—offer your library as a meeting space for the organization, if they're the type of SBSO to hold meetings. (Take members on a tour of your workspaces before or after the meeting if they seem receptive!) If your library has a bulletin board or an email newsletter, offer them space to advertise or otherwise share about their activities.

Keep up the positive pressure!

If your initial outreach goes well, then keep meeting with your SBSO. Attend their meetings as regularly as you can. Refer to the following questions to shape future interactions:

- What are the gaps I want to close in my library's small business services? What resources does this SBSO have that could help my library patrons?
- What is the objective of this SBSO? Which small businesses in my community are involved with this organization?
- What connections does this organization have to other small business support organizations? How receptive is this organization to partnering with my library? What can I do (within capacity and reason) to increase their enthusiasm for a library partner?

SMALL BUSINESS OWNERS

“There is so much information you need to organize to start a business and be successful. We learned how to organize our plans and dreams and to make them functional [at the Macedon Public Library Entrepreneur Workshop series]. We developed a plan and broke down the steps to achieve what we wanted to do. . . . A workshop series like this, with your peers to bounce ideas off of, mentors to guide you, and speakers to inspire you, is a great way to begin. Libraries are the perfect place to have a program like this.”

Communicating with...

SMALL BUSINESS OWNERS

Small business owners and entrepreneurs are those who own, run, or are considering starting a small business in your community.

They may be long-time owners, new founders, or people considering whether or not their idea could become a business. You may be able to see their brick-and-mortar businesses in the community, or they may be less visible in home-based businesses or working remotely on technology-based companies. They span demographic groups and industries.

The library can communicate its value to those with any level of experience, industry, or type of business. Because of the important role the library can play in equitable opportunity for BIPOC, women, and entrepreneurs from other marginalized groups, you may also choose to focus on services tailored to particular groups in your community.

Because business owners and entrepreneurs are diverse, the library may want to use multiple avenues to reach them. Established business owners may be members of formal organizations, like Chambers of Commerce or Downtown Associations, which may be interested in a presentation from the library. Grassroots networking or social groups, which may be specific to a demographic (e.g., a quarterly women’s business mixer) or an industry (e.g., artists or tech companies) may attract people with a range of experience. Business support organizations may refer their clients to library resources.

As many business owners or potential entrepreneurs are not connected to groups, libraries may also reach out to individuals. Simply taking a walk along a main street or commercial district and visiting shop owners can start developing relationships and raising awareness. As many small business owners may be using social media to market their own businesses, social posts and events may help reach them. Libraries can even use their own market research databases and skills to look up and reach out to new, home-based, or minority-owned businesses in their community that they might otherwise miss. Libraries may also find business owners in other areas of the library. Entrepreneurs or business owners may already come to the library for other reasons, like bringing children to story time or checking out books for pleasure reading, but be entirely unaware that the library could also help their business.

The library may have several possible goals in reaching out to business owners.

- Program attendance or resource use. Individual small business owners or entrepreneurs are often the intended audience for library programs and resources. Libraries may want to connect with owners in order to let them know about these opportunities and encourage library use. This can be especially important because many potential patrons may not associate the library with small business support, and so would not have thought to look to the library for assistance. Shifting their perspective to see the library as a business resource is as important as letting them know about specific offerings.
- Input or feedback. The library may want to get input from small business owners about their goals and needs, or about the kinds of programs and resources they want the library to offer. Input from BIPOC and underserved entrepreneurs may be particularly valuable in creating inclusive, equitable, and culturally responsive services.
- Partnership. In some cases, libraries may partner with established businesses to offer programs or services. Examples might be a craft store owner teaching a knitting class, a panel of local Latinx entrepreneurs sharing their success stories and tips in Spanish, or a group of new entrepreneurs rotating leadership of a networking group. Local business owners have much to offer as partners - subject matter expertise in the area of their business as well as in business itself, deep knowledge of local resources and opportunities, a model of attainable success, willingness to mentor, and an existing audience to attend their programs. Libraries may sometimes shy away from working with for-profit businesses. However, it is usually possible to partner with no ethical, legal, or policy issues, as long as certain basic guidelines are followed. For example, the library should have clear, consistent boundaries established for what is and is not permissible around selling, promoting their businesses, or collecting patron information.

Overall, to communicate with busy business owners, libraries should try to meet them at their point of need—where they are, and with resources they need at that moment. They may not remember long lists of possible services and resources that are not immediately relevant. Therefore, the library should focus its communications on letting them know about specific, immediate opportunities, or on shifting their perspective so they think of the library as a place to turn when future needs arise.

The key message for libraries to communicate to this audience is that the library can save their business time and money.

Communicating with...

ELECTED OFFICIALS, FUNDERS, AND COMMUNITY DECISION MAKERS

Leaders in your community influence the library’s support and success. Sometimes their influence is direct, such as elected officials who govern a city budget that includes the library, or funders or donors who decide whether or not to give to the library.

However, even if they do not directly control library resources, the support of community leaders can still make a significant impact on how the library is perceived and supported in the community. If leaders understand the role the library has to play in supporting small business, and see the library as an ally in achieving their goals for the community, they can raise awareness and rally support for the library on a large scale or with new audiences.

Examples of community leaders may include:

- Local, state, and national elected officials
- Leadership staff for cities or municipalities, such as city managers or department heads
- Local grant-making organizations, such as Rotary or Kiwanis
- Individual donors
- Leaders of influential or trusted community organizations
- Individuals with strong relationships and networks in BIPOC and marginalized communities

The goals of communicating with this audience focus on broadening their overall perception of the library to include small business and economic support. Many of these leaders may not attend the library’s business programs or use its resources themselves, and may not be in a position to refer individual patrons. Instead, libraries want to ensure that community leaders think of the library as an engine for a thriving local economy. Specific goals may include:

- Education. Let this group know about the library’s strong support for small business, entrepreneurship, and economic development. Instead of listing resources or programs, focus on telling stories that demonstrate library use and impact. Give examples of how entrepreneurs used library resources to help them succeed from Libraries Build Business, or better yet, from your own community.
- Fiscal support. Some in this group control the library’s access to funding, either through oversight of its operating budget or through potential grants. When these leaders believe in the library’s economic value, they may be more likely to see continued or expanded funding as a good return on investment.
- Political or social support. In a complex and fraught political environment, libraries may need community leaders to stand up for their importance and value to the community.

This may mean speaking at Board or community meetings, authoring op-eds for the local paper, or even just speaking up as an ally of the library with their friends and family. The people in this group are thought leaders whose opinions influence the community. If they believe in the value of the library for all people at all stages of life—as a need-to-have rather than a nice-to-have - they can move public opinion.

“The CASH Campaign of Maryland has worked in partnership with the Baltimore County Public Library throughout the years on several programs. Together, the free programs and services provided in collaboration are highly effective at reaching our shared goal of supporting the economic advancement and financial capability of Marylanders. Thanks to our partnership with BCPL on the Entrepreneur Academy program, CASH has been able to reach hundreds of small business owners and entrepreneurs each year and advise them on a range of small business financial topics, including record keeping and tax compliance. CASH is grateful to the dedicated BCPL staff for doing their part to ensure that traditionally under-resourced communities are prioritized.”

—Francesca Jean-Baptiste, Director of Tax Partnerships
CASH Campaign of Maryland

The key message for libraries to communicate to this audience is that the library can help them accomplish their goal of a thriving and resilient local economy for all.

One Small Business at a Time Building Economic Opportunity in America's Communities

Libraries propel entrepreneurship and economic opportunity across the United States. To research or brainstorm new ideas or markets, develop business plans, gain access to emerging technologies, leverage local business resources, and sustain an enterprise, the 123,000 libraries across the country are ideal partners. Libraries offer a cost-effective national network that can be leveraged to support both aspiring and existing business owners—including those not traditionally served by business support networks. To advance economic opportunity for all, we urge decision makers in the U.S. Small Business Administration, U.S. Department of Commerce, and other federal agencies; the White House; U.S. Congress; business-related associations, foundations and corporate philanthropy; think tanks; and other organizations to include libraries in their plans to promote and advance entrepreneurship and small business development.

Library support for small businesses

Nearly all public libraries offer baseline support for entrepreneurs by providing meeting spaces, public computers, and internet access, as well as access to e-books, magazines, and newspapers. Many libraries of all types offer introductory to advanced support such as locally relevant business start-up classes, market research help and database access, and guidance in leveraging social media and other online tools. The LA Law Library (CA), for example, offers a class series to take budding entrepreneurs from business idea to business plan, and provides legal perspective on starting and operating a business. In Pennsylvania, small business

Takeaways for decision makers

- Realizing economic opportunity for all means heightened entrepreneurship and small business activity across the nation. How can such activity be promoted and supported cost effectively? One solution is libraries—123,000 strong—already present in communities across the United States.
- Libraries have the information resources, technology, physical presence, and expert staff to research and brainstorm new ideas or markets, develop business plans, gain access to or learn about emerging technologies, obtain information about intellectual property, and implement business plans and sustain an enterprise. Libraries help small business owners minimize risk and launch their ventures by offering online and community-based professional development classes, prototyping tools, connection to community resources, and marketing assistance.
- Leverage libraries in new policy initiatives to grow entrepreneurship and small business.

The Baltimore County (MD) Public Library's popular Entrepreneurship Academy program provides classes on writing a business plan, market research, financial recordkeeping and taxes, merchandising, pricing, and engaging 15th customers. In response to community demand, the classes are available in English and Spanish and are offered in-person as well as via several times throughout the year. The program hosts a regular "Pop-Up Shop" event for 1025 Small Business Day and local entrepreneurs. More than 60 vendors at three different libraries, and more than 400 customers visit the shops. The Pop-Up Shops are a fun way for entrepreneurs to build confidence and share their ideas without investing in market brick-and-mortar location.

Serving underrepresented entrepreneurs

While entrepreneurship is a growing path to economic mobility, many individuals face barriers to access. Libraries help reach these demographics by offering targeted entrepreneurship programs and assistance for underserved groups. The Providence (RI) Public Library, for one, partners with the Rhode Island Hispanic Chamber of Commerce to offer free business education seminars for Spanish-speaking small business owners and can serve business owners in Spanish when needed. At Purdue University (IN) Libraries, business preneural work with veterans taking part in the Entrepreneurial Bootcamp for Veterans with Disabilities as they develop marketing plans and provide additional support by phone, email, and online, including access to relevant library databases and software. The Los Angeles Public Library worked with street vendors to develop mobile phone accessible self-paced courses to navigate business and safety concerns. Allen County (IN) and Orange County (FL) public libraries offer entrepreneurship programming targeted to teens and youth; the Norman (OK) High School Library Learning Commons includes a Maker Lab for students to engage. And, the Spokane County (WA) Library District's Small Business Boot Camp helped rural business owners with limited internet access build their business through training and micro-grants. By identifying local needs, libraries expand pathways toward economic opportunity for all.

ding studio, for example, entrepreneurs as, greenscreens, lighting, and editing software audio, video, and graphics. ### Tips for Building Relationships WITH ELECTED OFFICIALS

Do your homework.

Look up the elected official using an internet search—chances are, they have a social media presence, an up-to-date LinkedIn account, and a biography on the website of the government body they were elected to. Find out what issues they ran on (if they have a campaign website or social media account, this is helpful), what committees or subcommittees they may belong to, and what their personal passions or interests are. Remember, your goal is to establish a rapport and be remembered by this individual, so don't be shy about using information that they've made publicly available.

Go where they are.

Especially at the local level, most elected officials will make public appearances, hold coffee hours, and make the effort to be present in their community. For example, if they're on a city or town council, then open meetings are usually scheduled in advance for the public to attend and comment. Start attending! Finally, if you see them at the grocery store, it's certainly okay to introduce yourself, but use your judgment before pressing your issue. It might be more appropriate to simply ask to set up a meeting and let them get on with their shopping than to push them when they aren't prepared. A bad first impression is hard to shake.

Bring a 1-2-page summary of your issue.

Elected officials and their staff have very busy schedules and will be hard pressed to remember meeting you and what you were concerned about. Anything more than 2 pages will not get read. Use large font, bolding, underlining, and color printing to make the main points stand out. Put your Bottom Line Up Front (BLUF). Be prepared to answer these questions from the elected official the best you can.

- What actions do YOU want me to take?
- Why do YOU want me to do that?
- What are the current and/or potential LOCAL impacts?
- What is YOUR story in relation to this policy?

ALA American Library Association  TIPS FOR BUILDING RELATIONSHIPS WITH ELECTED OFFICIALS / 1

Lead with a story, follow with data.

When you're talking to an elected official, it's important to demonstrate the depth and breadth of an issue. Give your concerns depth and explain what their support and/or attention will have on one person—you can talk about yourself. You're an engaged constituent.

Next, give your issue breadth. They've heard about the human impact, now demonstrate how wide it goes using data or statistics. If your library serves 3,000 patrons a month, then they're helping 3,000 constituents by supporting you. If your business center resources have helped 70% of its users start or maintain their small business, then share that and discuss what they can do to make that number 100%. Make sure you have data on the impact. (See "Do your homework.")

Invite them to tour the library.

Librarians seeking to build rapport, it's important to emphasize the strengths of your program and the current impact your library has on their community. If they haven't been already, invite them to visit, or ask for an opportunity to point out areas or services where you would like to improve, and ask about funding options at the local, state, and federal levels. (Even if you've done research on this before, they may know something you don't.) Finally, getting your elected official in the building if they haven't been before turns a library from a street address to a community hub.

Follow up!

Engaging with constituents are effective follow-up methods. Either way, reintroduce yourself briefly, thank them for their time. If you haven't invited them to tour the library, this would be an excellent opportunity to do so. Don't send extensive attachments as part of an email unless they ask. Finally, don't be discouraged if a staff member responds to you—that's why they're in that position. Be excited at the opportunity to build an additional relationship within an elected official's office.

Engage with library supporters.

Engaging with hostile public officials should be undertaken carefully. Be mindful of your time and energy if you decide to do so. If an elected official is openly insulting or slandering your profession and what you do for your patrons, then it may not be productive to reach out to them. Look for supporters within your community that can speak to the value of your library and the services it provides (including small business support).

A NOTE ON THESE TIPS: Some of the advice compiled here was inspired by resources from the Congressional Management Foundation and adapted to best fit library advocates.

LIBRARY STAFF

The tools in this section are designed to be shared with library staff who may not be directly involved with small business services. Cultivating library-wide understanding of what you have to offer can be helpful in many ways.

- Staff who interact with patrons may receive questions from or observe people who could benefit from the library’s small business resources. Even if those staff cannot answer in-depth questions about small business themselves, if they are generally aware of the types of resources the library can offer, they can make an appropriate referral to a colleague.
- Staff who attend community meetings and develop partnerships may learn about community needs and goals related to small business support.

With a general idea of what kinds of support the library can provide, they can speak succinctly about the library’s value and potentially connect the community partner with an expert at the library.

- Staff in back-of-house positions may be able to alert patron-facing staff to relevant new resources, or have ideas for creating support structures that build on small business services.
- Staff in any role may be asked about the library by their friends, family, or community.

The primary goal of talking with library staff is general education. Most staff do not need to be experts in the library’s small business resources. However, these services will be best supported if most staff have a broad concept of the library’s value to the local economy, how the library can help small business owners and entrepreneurs, and where to look for more in-depth help.

Ferguson (MO) Municipal Public Library helped an aspiring entrepreneur set up a Facebook page to sell his BBQ sauce, assisted him with computer skills, and connected him with other resources, including SCORE. The BBQ sauce—Freddie Lee’s American Gourmet—is now available in 1500+ grocery stores.

The key message for this audience is that they do not need to be business experts to support small business owners and entrepreneurs. All they need to know is where to turn for more support.

Business Services at the Library

TALKING POINTS FOR LIBRARY STAFF

Be sure to share information across the library staff about ongoing business-related programming, services, and resources. Recognize that existing library resources, such as printers, meeting space, and audio/visual equipment may be exactly what an entrepreneur needs to work on their business. Making sure that all library staff are sharing a consistent message about the resources available for entrepreneurs and small business owners is key to making them feel welcome and equipped to work in the library.

Impact Data

St. Louis County Library

The St. Louis County Library in Missouri created the Small Business Value Calculator in 2018 in order to put a monetary value on the services they provide. To build the calculator, they listed all the small business services and resources they offer at the library and looked for what they would cost on the open market. Resources may include: marketing, demographic, industry, and consumer research; computers and technology; and classes and workshops. The staff totaled up the dollar value of using everything the library offers just once in a year and determined that the library was saving customers more than $13,000 each year. This piece of data catches the attention of business owners, community partners, and decision makers and helps to illustrate the great work the library is doing on small business development.

Cuyahoga County Public Library

In their first year of operation, over 450 graduates completed Cuyahoga County Public Library's Encore Entrepreneur Academy. Over 94% agreed that they were better prepared to create a business, and 83% learned skills to grow their existing business. Over 90% of their attendees were women—the majority of whom were minority women.

Ferguson Municipal Public Library

Ferguson Municipal Public Library in Missouri helped an aspiring entrepreneur set up a Facebook page to sell his BBQ sauce. The library assisted him with this, as well as computer skills, and connected him with other resources, including SCORE. The BBQ sauce—Freddie Lee's American Gourmet—is now available in 1500+ grocery stores.

Baltimore County Public Library
In 2018, 60 participants, 52 of whom completed the series entirely, participated in the Entrepreneur Academy, offered at branches of the Baltimore County Public and Enoch Pratt Free Libraries. As of 2022, more than 350 people have successfully completed the series through the Baltimore County Public Library.

Quotes from Program Participants

Participating in the Small Business Boot Camp was very validating to me as an artist because it meant my business was being taken seriously by someone other than me and, not only that, it felt like the staff at the Spokane County Library District fully believed in my ability to be a successful business owner and wanted to help me succeed, so that was a marvelous experience. Having monthly meetings was also helpful because it provided accountability for keeping the business part of my art career top of mind, rather than letting that slide in favor of day to day running the business and trying to make the work to do.

—Megan Perkins, Local Artist and Small Business Boot Camp Participant
Spokane County Library District, Spokane, WA

There is so much information you need to organize to start a business and be successful. We learned how to organize our plans and dreams and to make them functional [at the Macedon Public Library Entrepreneur Workshop series]. We developed a plan and broke down the steps to achieve what we want to do... A workshop series like this, with your peers to bounce ideas off of, mentors to guide you, and speakers to inspire you, is a great way to begin. Libraries are the perfect place to have a workshop series like this.

—Melinda Kelsey, Proprietor, Kitten Around Cat Boarding
Macedon Public Library, Macedon, NY

Evaluating Your Business Programs

Tell a story with impact data and feedback from participants

Monitoring and evaluation of your library programs is critical to success and sustaining your initiative. Not only does data and feedback about your programs help you to continuously improve programs and adapt to the needs of your community, it also enables you to showcase your impact.

Use our Libraries Build Business Monitoring and Evaluation Resource Guide (above) to consider strategies for effectively evaluating your programs and receiving essential feedback from the community. The resource guide shares information about using PLA's Project Outcome (left) to create customized surveys for your small business programs as well as the Libraries Build Business initiative's survey, interview and focus group instruments and protocols. Read the Topsham Public Library Case Study (right) to learn more about the role of monitoring and evaluation in your library's business programs.

Evaluation from a variety of perspectives is critical, and you can use interviews, surveys, and focus groups to gather community input—including from local small businesses, community partners and small business support organizations, and elected officials. Providing stakeholders the opportunity for feedback is a vital component of effective communication and outreach and opens the door for building long-term relationships and investment. Use the LBB Interview and Protocols documents for Elected Officials, Small Businesses, and Library Focus Groups (left) as a template for these conversations.
